By means of which rendition divers places of great strength were gained without expence of blood and treasure, and the necessities of the Army supplyed by that plentiful Country, where many sick and wounded Souldiers were tenderly cherished and provided for by the said British and English Protestants; And divers others of the said British and English Protestants did before the first of December, One thousand six hundred and fourty nine submit themselves, and have ever since not onely lived peaceably under the Protection of, and obedience to the Common-wealth, but have by their large contributions to the supply of the Army there evidenced their sense of duty and good affection to the same; and the inferiour sort of them who continued under the command of the late Earl of Ormond and Lord Inchiquin until necessity inforced them to submission, have since their said submission done faithful service to this Common-wealth against the Rebells there: His Highness the Lord Protector taking into consideration the concessions granted by his Highness to invite the Return of the said Rebellers to the obedience of the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, and being desirous that the same may be duly performed
